

Publicity Information:
Franklin Gallery@History
History Department Carr Building
Exhibits Opening 19 Oct: 4.30-6.30 pm

“John Hope Franklin: Imprint of an American Scholar”

Curated by John Gartrell, Director, Franklin Research Center, Duke University

John Hope Franklin was one of the best well-known and influential scholars of his era and broke countless professional barriers along the way. Franklin was also the definition of a public intellectual, continuously lending his scholarship and influence to causes beyond the walls of academia. This exhibition explores John Hope Franklin's indelible imprint on the classroom, the institution, his public and private relationships, and his life's work of utilizing history and knowledge to cultivate a better human society. The exhibit concludes with an itinerary of his profile as an international scholar.

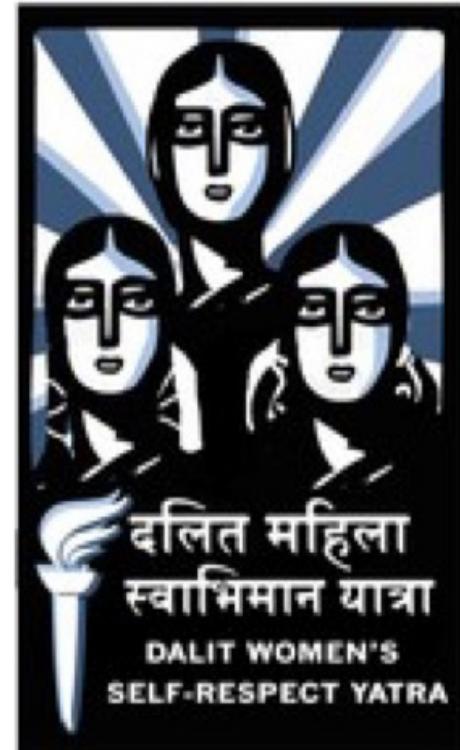

“Internationalisms and Solidarities”

A composite portrait of intellectual-biographical and political art of the twentieth century in two-segments bridging the NAACP and the Dalit [Untouchable] Movement in India to the Art of the Cultural Revolution, the exhibit captures the circulation of ideas and snapshots of individuals and activists who reached out across boundaries and borders in their struggles, showcasing links between international and domestic political mobilizations from the 1920s to the 2010s.

“From NAACP to AIDMAM [All India Dalit Women’s Rights Forum]”

Curated by Sucheta Mazumdar, Associate Professor, Department of History

Profiles of the long history of engagement of African American, Asian, and Asian American activists, to introduce conversations linked in a common struggle for racial justice and international solidarity ranging from W. E. B. Du Bois and B. R. Ambedkar, Gandhi and King, to C. L. R. James and Grace Lee Boggs, Black Panthers and the SF Third World Student Strike, to the current mobilizations of AIDMAM reaching out to Angela Davis.

“Building Solidarity: Themes in Chinese Cultural Revolution Poster Art”
Curated by Sucheta Mazumdar

Of the many different types of art posters produced in China during the Cultural Revolution, an important genre was devoted to staging solidarity. In this selection of posters from Duke's Rubenstein Collection, the art portrays projects of building solidarity through combinations of workers, peasants, soldiers and students marching together, ethnic minorities in community dances and wedding celebrations, and images of the whole world rising in solidarity with Mao looking on. The Cultural Revolution style of art with its signature use of radiating rays with its bold slogans in woodcut or painted Socialist Realist art style, used Maoism as inspiration for solidarity and was emulated by many activist groups worldwide, including the Black Panther movement.

“Internationalisms and Solidarities”: Curatorial assistant: Alta Zhuyun Zhang, Graduate Student, Digital Art History Program
Cultural Revolution Timeline: Luo Zhou, Chinese Studies Librarian, Duke University

Further information: Prof. Sucheta Mazumdar, Chair, Franklin Gallery Committee & Project Director: <skmmaz@duke.edu>

Exhibit funding: Provost's Office, Humanities Futures Initiative at the Franklin Humanities Institute, Franklin Research Center, History Department, Global Asia Initiative, Asia Pacific Studies Institute, Duke Human Rights Center at the Kenan Institute for Ethics